Taryn is a month, Attorney General Menoshius issued a five-year moratorium on new city-wide licensing programs in Los Angeles. On April 17, the measure, Council File No. 13-1493, directs the city attorney to cease any citywide licensing program since its introduction in early 2019.

Before this measure was passed, Los Angeles was the only major city in the U.S. with strict prohibitions on type of street vending, and without any citywide licensing program for vendors. The first proposal to license sidewalk vending in Los Angeles was introduced for debate five years ago, but has been stalled due to controversy and uncertainty about how to move forward.

While some city council members supported the idea, others opposed it, citing concerns about freedom of speech, individual liberty, and potential for over-regulation.

The current status of street vending in Los Angeles and at the state level. The proposed city and state regulations may require any type of street vending, including regulating the time, place, and manner of vending. The city council is working on a proposed ordinance that would restrict street vending.

The Los Angeles County Council has already passed such a measure, and street vendors are being fined for violating the regulations.
